Native American Curriculum Initiative

Teaching Artist Roster

The Arts Education Program of the Utah Division of Arts & Museums (UDAM) maintains a teaching artist roster as a resource for grantees, schools and communities (https://artsandmuseums.utah.gov/teaching-artist-roster/). Artists are accepted through a two panel process for artistic and educational merit. In 1996, the UDAM folk and traditional arts panel and the arts education panel ruled that folk and traditional artists may be recommended and approved as standard bearers in their art form by each respective and specific cultural community.

This new Native American Teaching Artist Roster has been established with help from Brigham Young University and their Native Curriculum Initiative. As tribal leaders guide this curriculum initiative, they are equally forthcoming identifying those that best present their songs, dances, stories, baskets, weavings and other art forms important to them. UDAM is delighted in supporting this initiative and in welcoming artists new to our state agency. For more information on BYU’s Native American Curriculum Initiative visit https://byuartspartnershipblog.org/category/native-american/
Adam Conte is from the Oneida Nation of Wisconsin and is part Mohawk. He wants people to know and believe that Native Americans are beautiful, smart, very talented, thriving, relevant and resilient. Currently, most online content is negative (suicide, missing indigenous women, drugs, alcohol, Covid victims, income disparity). There isn’t enough focus on that which is good and demonstrates talent. There are athletes, entrepreneurs, scholars, attorneys, authors, visual artists, musicians, scientists, mathematicians, and college professors, all within the native community. Adam thinks it is important to raise awareness of the challenges, but know his artistic contributions are important. He wants to emphasize that which is positive and show the Native people in a bright light.

Learners can expect a crash course in the development of content. First, what did content look like 10 years ago, 5 years ago and what does content look like now? Second, what do we want our end goal to be in our content? Do we want to raise awareness, or issue a call for action? Three, dive into various aspects to explore what can be done to create a feeling about an issue. Four, prepare three different soundtracks for the same footage. How does the feeling change based on each piece of music? How is the change reflected? Five, the process of filmmaking will explore editing, camera movements, settings, storyboarding, conceptualization and all components of pre-production. Adam’s classes are for learners in 8th grade and above.
Alan Groves
Native American beadwork and quillwork

Alan Groves is a member of the Northern Ute and Hopi tribes. Professionally, he is a high school teacher and also serves as a teacher coach in his school community as well. He earned a master’s degree from Brigham Young University.

In his youth Alan primarily used drawing and painting as his preferred media for his artistic expression, but as he has grown older he has learned the traditional Native American arts of beading and porcupine quillwork. He makes and sells jewelry and also makes pow wow regalia for his family’s personal use in their cultural practice.

Before contact with Europeans, Native Americans used natural media for their art and using porcupine quills was a very common practice. This changed after contact with Europeans because trading offered them other materials to use. The Utes were one of the first tribes to have horses which allowed them to trade for glass beads early on. Today, Utes are known for their intricate beadwork using glass seed beads.

As a teacher and an artist, Alan implements ideas from Native American culture and art in his classroom. He strongly believes exposure to a broad variety of perspectives will help our youth deal with the global issues that they will face.

Anna Benally
Weaving, jewelry making, language presentations

Anna grew up on the Navajo reservation, in Hogback, near Shiprock, New Mexico. The Navajo culture is just a way of life for her. She speaks her native Navajo language fluently and loves to share her culture with others, especially her children, making sure they know their heritage. Anna comes from a family of weavers. She learned this skill from her mother and grandmother. She is experienced in presenting about weaving, jewelry making, making fry bread, and also teaching the Navajo language to various ages --from children to college students where she taught Navajo language courses at BYU. As she teaches aspects of the Navajo language, she loves sharing information about the language.

Sharing her Navajo culture is Anna’s passion. Anna is comfortable presenting to various age groups and in many settings. She works to develop her presentation based on the needs of those she is working with. Her language presentations allow learners to experience history while participating using simple Navajo phrases. When teaching weaving, she uses a simplified loom so that participants can interact with the weaving process. Anna also teaches jewelry making where participants go home with a finished product. Although supplies for all the interactive parts of these workshops should be provided by the groups she is working with, Anna is willing to sell her beads and jewelry supplies at a low cost as part of the presentation.

Crystal is native Navajo and Tewa and is originally from the Navajo Reservation in Tsaile, Arizona. She earned a degree in History at Brigham Young University. While there, she nurtured her love for history and learned more about Native American cultures. As she became a mother, she started sewing and making things for her baby. She made her daughter’s first pair of baby moccasins and was hooked. Since then, Crystal has gained a passion for creating beautiful things, and more than that, she has found a passion in contributing to the preservation of Native American cultures.

Crystal grew up traveling around to different Nations, and saw so much positivity in the beautiful things each tribe offers--every tribe is talented in something. Traveling around to see the variety of tribal art (weaving, beading, pottery, silversmithing, basket-making, etc.) continues to impact her art today.

Her presentations include a slideshow of visuals as well as physical examples of artwork significant to Native American tribes, and can include a demonstration of beadwork. While Crystal would like to reserve teaching the art of moccasin-making for Native students only, she is happy to show her art and demonstrate her beadwork with all students and teachers through her presentations. Crystal would love others to know that Native American people are alive and thriving today. Through her art, she wants to contribute to that learning and the understanding that Native people are here, and they have a future here with meaningful contributions. She hopes to enable teachers to teach appropriate information about Native American cultures today.

Coming from the rich oral tradition of her Lakota and Plains Apache family, Dovie Thomason has had a lifetime of listening and telling the traditional Native stories that are the cultural “heartsong” of community values and memory. Both wise and mischievous, Dovie unfolds the layers of her indigenous worldview and teachings with respect, sly humor and rich vocal transformations. When she adds personal stories and untold histories, the result is a contemporary narrative of Indigenous North America told with elegance, wit and passion.

Her programs are a heartfelt sharing of Native stories she has had the privilege of hearing from Elders of many nations and are woven with why we need stories, how stories are a cultural guide in shaping values and making responsible choices, how stories build communities and celebrates our relationship with the Earth and all living beings. The oral tradition she gifts to listeners inspires delight in spoken language arts, encourages reading, supports literacy, can be used in classrooms to motivate better writing as students experience storytelling techniques, literary devices and effective communication. All of this takes place while they are exploring their own narratives and family values.

Dovie has represented the U.S. as the featured storyteller throughout the world. In 2015, she was honored as the storyteller-writer in residence at the Centre for Creative Writing and Oral Culture at the University of Manitoba in Canada.

Dovie has used her storytelling to advise the UCLA Film School on narrative in modern film, NASA on indigenous views of technology, the Smithsonian Associates’ Scholars Program and the premier TEDx Leadership Conference. Her role as a traditional cultural artist and educator has been honored by the National Storytelling Network’s ORACLE: Circle of Excellence Award and the Wordcraft Circle of Native Writers’ Traditional Storyteller Award.
My name is Elias Gold. I am a Native American, Navajo from Shiprock, New Mexico. I’m an artist, filmmaker and storyteller and am graduating in Media Arts Studies (Film & Media) from Brigham Young University. I am always seeking to educate and tell others about my culture through my art.

I can offer opportunities to educate and promote discussion about Native American culture and perspectives by storytelling through the exhibition of my art (acrylic paintings, pen and marker, digital works). I use my art to tell people about Native American representation and history, answer questions and encourage people to bridge gaps with people of other cultures and backgrounds in a healthy way.

Eva Keams
Visual art, dance, beadwork, cultural presentation

Eva has loved the arts since she was a child. She began dancing when she was four years old, and has always had a passion for the visual arts. Her father and grandfather are visual artists as well. She is Navajo, but grew up off the reservation and did not have a lot of Native American influence as a young child. As she’s grown, she has reached out more and more to people to help teach and guide her in traditional ways, and in cultural ways so she can pass that knowledge on to her children. With her art and dancing, she wants to give her children the understanding and the visual space that she did not have. One thing that her Native teachers have always impressed upon her mind is the need for Native Americans to share their knowledge. One of the biggest Native life lessons she has found is to not hoard anything—you need to share your knowledge and talents. The accumulation of knowledge is a lifelong journey, and because of that, we have a lifelong obligation to share that knowledge. As Eva grows in learning, she wants to share that learning with others. She wants to break down stereotypes, build bridges, and create safe spaces to learn where there aren’t stupid questions.

Eva offers a range of experiences for learners including Q&A sessions, hands on workshops K-12, group collaborative projects over the course of a couple days, dance performances with explanations of the dances and songs, presentations on how customs and traditions influence our everyday living. She likes teaching about plants or moccasins or traditional homes (traditional Native American cultures) and sharing legends with a hands-on activity or through the use of visual arts and dance. Her presentations are based on indigenous cultures in general, and explaining how traditions and customs affect us in everyday living, and how that might impact Native students in their classes.

Haven Miller comes from the Navajo tribe in Utah. Interested in stories since childhood, her interest took her on a creative turn that turned into art. Haven’s goal is to do children’s’ book illustrations. She’s always been interested in Navajo stories and culture and would love to share with them with the world. She finds that some cultural differences are hard to get across and would love bridge those gaps in understanding and appreciation.

Influenced by the Navajo stories told by her uncle and mom growing up, she wants to share those with the world. She is able to teach students about Navajo culture and stories and drawing techniques.

Johnny Keams
Cultural presentation, storytelling

Inspired by his father’s experiences in boarding schools, Johnny Keams tells stories to highlight Native histories and overturn stereotypes. He began presenting Native stories and histories during his time as Native Club President at BYU. Johnny Keams is Navajo and has a Bachelor’s in Computer Science. He uses his platform to showcase differences between life on and off the reservation, as well as stories of Native struggles. While at UVU, he noticed that club associations needed people to talk about Native topics and he volunteered, presenting public discourses on Native Americans in media, common micro aggressions against Natives, and on mental health issues.

As a father of three, Johnny tries to teach his children about Navajo culture and instill in them the knowledge of his father and grandfather. As a presenter, he draws on his cultural heritage to encourage listeners to look past stereotypes and see the difference in Natives from tribe to tribe. Johnny isn’t afraid to shy away from Native traumas, and shares his Dad’s stories from boarding school. He says, “when my Dad was taken to boarding school, he was five years old. My son is six and it touches me to see the similarities.” Johnny also showcases how negative media portrayals of Natives can have a huge effect on how Natives see themselves. His personal experiences and presentations open a dialogue of cross-cultural understanding and show how Natives’ modern struggles stem from past traumas.

Judy Mansfield
Cultural presentation, beadwork, dance, music

Judy Mansfield was raised on the Yakama Indian Reservation where she grew up learning stories from her own family and other tribes. Today she uses these various forms and interpretations of native symbols in her craftmaking. Judy learned her beadwork from brothers and sisters and aunts growing up—not just the craft but the stories behind it. Judy is a former Miss Yakama Nation, Miss Congress of American Indian winner and the former Miss Brigham Young University.

She is a former math professor, having taught at the university level for 16 years. She has been doing cultural presentations for 40 years everywhere from North Dakota to Australia. She has experience teaching in universities, high schools, civic organizations, elementary schools and church groups.

Judy focuses on teaching learners the higher level thinking that Native Artwork contains. She uses storytelling, birdcall, puppetry, art and crafts during her presentations. She strives to teach learners not only the art but the sophisticated mathematical elements within the art.

Her specialty is working with teachers, sending out a survey before the event to ask what their specific needs and interests are. She presents on cultural awareness, sensitivity, and cultural mediation. Judy has presented her material at national education conferences.

Kyle Reyes
Visual and clothing art

Kyle is a Native Hawaiian street artist who grew up in Los Angeles, California. 20 years ago, he joined a cultural dance group and became fascinated with the art form of storytelling. Through song and dance, he realized he wanted to be connected to his own cultural storytelling. He now does workshops called Walking With Your Story with Native American youth in hopes that they connect visually with their cultures. He has the youth apply their visual history to an article of clothing, which normalizes seeing their cultural patterns in everyday life. He emphasizes to the youth the importance of internalizing their story so that it has meaning for them.

Kyle is the Utah Valley University Vice President of Student Affairs and previously was a Professor to K-12 teachers in the university’s education program. He also has experience in painting and illustration. Kyle’s passion is empowering youth to find their story, and, more importantly, discover the courage to tell it. His workshop includes:

- Mapping their identity
- Researching colors, images, and patterns that represent an aspect of their story
- Deciding how to tell their story visually
- Sketching their design choice on clothing
- Going home with their finished product

Kyle has also taught teachers how to do this workshop for their own classes. He and his wife Michelle both love to share their Native American culture with others and help others do the same.

My name is Lapita Keith Frewin. I am a full-blooded Navajo born on the Navajo reservation. I left home at the early age of nine to live with a main-stream American family to get a better education. Returning home every summer, I was able to get the best of both worlds. After graduating High School I enrolled in Brigham Young University were I was able to get a Bachelors Degree in Social Work and a minor in Native American Studies. I currently am a Social Worker helping families of all cultures.

In my spare time I am to able to fulfill one of my passions in life by preserving not just my Navajo Culture, but all Native American Cultures. I saw so much that was misunderstood in mainstream America that I decided to do as much as I could to connect that gap.

I love working with all ages. Kids are great because they don't know what is incorrect and I can enrich their young minds, and I love the teens and young adults because they are so eager to learn and I love working with adults because they appreciate and are respectful of Native Cultures. I am predominately a beadworker. Many museums have allowed me to study old specimens and I have tried to recreate those pieces using authentic materials. It is an awesome feeling when you bring something back to life knowing where it came from and knowing you can share and preserve this way of life.

Since I work full-time I try to keep my artist in residence projects close by, I have more time in the summer where I have 6 weeks off. I am open to anything from beadwork, moccasins, making drums to teaching language lessons through games.

Leo Platero is a painter, writer and silversmith from the Navajo tribe. Many of his ideas came from his Dad who was a silversmith and his mom who was a rug weaver. Growing up out on the reservation herding sheep he saw lots of colors and shapes that inspired him in his art. Leo learned how to silversmith from watching his Dad. Leo studied Fine Arts at BYU and went on to teach high school art for 33 years.

He has a long history teaching art to students ad well as working with senior citizen groups. Leo is able to do presentations on art, as well as hands on workshops teaching art techniques.

My name is Lynne Hardy, and I am Dine (Navajo.) I am from Grey Mountain, Arizona. I love my Navajo culture, and am grateful for the things I was taught by my parents and my grandmother. I believe my love for art is a gift, and I need to use it to share my culture with others. The stories of my ancestors are powerful, and I want to portray that in the art I create. My style is modern, bright, and colorful, because that is how I view my culture and life living on the reservation: bright and colorful. I try to portray Native American people as authentic as I can.

Growing up, I was always bullied for the way my nose looked, and for my cheekbones. The combination of the two didn’t look good to me because I didn’t look like my peers. It took a long time for me to realize that I look like my grandmother and her grandmother before her, and that they were absolutely beautiful. Through my art, I want to encourage other Native youth struggling with their appearance to know that they do not have to change themselves to fit Western European features. They are beautiful as they are, and that’s what I want to portray in my art. Through my art, I hope to be a voice of change to how Native American cultures are represented. I want to make sure that the cultures are respected and preserved in my own way.

Although my art is bright and colorful, the history of Native Americans is not always bright and colorful. The genocide, assimilation, and colonization of Native Americans in the past and present are not easy topics to talk about. Native American youth know too well the issues and trials of the past, but I feel it is time for all youth to learn and be aware of these issues as they are responsible to learn and fix it. My artwork makes these difficult conversations accessible for children and youth.
Mandi White
Cultural presentation, seamstress

I am a college student who started sewing during the pandemic. As I started, my sewing took on another dimension and meaning: I learned about how I come from a long line of seamstresses, which is a skill that is dying out. Existing seamstresses are not sewing anymore because their vision is deteriorating. I decided to learn an ancient art form and modernize it with tiny but important details: cuter fabrics that are softer and easier to wear, elastic waistbands, pockets, linings, and washable, eco-friendly fabrics. Through my art form, I want to show that we are not a past-tense people; we are very much a present- and future-tense people. We are here and we are doing things.

Sewing is my way of keeping the past, present, and future. Sewing teaches me a lot about the personality of our Creator. Whenever I sew, I learn how the Creator works: that things take time, and I am reminded to trust the Creator’s timing for me.

I believe in the idea of good medicine. When I sew, good medicine is very important. Good medicine means imbuing my clothing with good intentions, with love, with good thoughts, and with good feelings so that when a person purchases and wears my creations, they are blessed even when they are sad because my clothes carry my good medicine. As an artist, I only create and sew when I am absolutely happy. I say good-bye to each creation as I send it off as part of my good medicine.

I teach sustainability from an indigenous perspective: fabric and clothing should be an investment for our future and an intergenerational heirloom for our progenitors. I am passionate about textiles and fabric: I invest in fabrics that are good for the environment because these fabrics have greater longevity and will hold up across the generations. I teach a cultural presentation and hands-on workshop that includes information about sustainable fabrics and how to sew. I also teach about the symbolism behind the tiers of Native Navajo skirts. I offer Native insights about the symbolic and spiritual importance of clothing, and how lifestyle trends today are actually a reflection of indigenous practice, including minimalism, van life, and tiny-house living.
Michele Reyes
Navajo weaving presentation

Michele is a Navajo (Diné) weaver and artist. She comes from a line of weavers and uses it as a way of connecting her to her grandmothers, her culture and identity as a Diné woman. Michele believes that preserving this form of art is imperative. While traditional rug weaving is typically a way of life to support one’s family, Michele weaves to continue that tradition and teach her children and others. Her style and method of weaving is slightly non-traditional as she has had to learn to weave with the use of one arm. She provides perspective of the power of creativity to continue traditions that promote Hózhó (balance and harmony) in life. She offers a presentation on the basics of Navajo weaving, culture and her own story to learners.

Michele’s beautiful woven rugs combine traditional Navajo patterns with some of her own style. Michele first began learning to weave as a teenager from her grandmother. Not long after, she lost her left arm in a car accident, and thought her weaving days were behind her. Years later, her husband Kyle surprised her with a loom that he’d asked her brother to make. “Determined to figure out a way to make it work for me, I began to weave again. That rug took me quite a while to finish, but when I did it was one of my great accomplishments.”

Ya’at’teeh, my name is Mickaela Allison- Aliifua and I am Navajo. I am currently a student at Utah Valley University. I teach Fancy Shawl and Jingle dress dances to K-12 students. I have a small business @aviedaisy which is a named after my maternal and paternal grandmothers. They taught me how to be a strong Navajo woman. Through them my mom has taught me beadwork and the importance of sharing my culture and showing who I am as a Navajo woman.

I started a small beadwork business in Oct. 2020 and I make beadwork for my two dogs who are my biggest motivation. I struggle with anxiety and depression and they have really helped me. To honor them I made beadwork dog collars and sell them to others who also want to honor their pets. I started beading when I was in middle school, and learned from my mom loom beading, stitch beading, and peyote stitch. Along with beadwork I also learned how to dance when I was young. My first memory is dancing for my 2nd grade class and proudly sharing my Native American culture with them. This experience has led me to K-12 students in Alpine and Nebo School Districts, as well as Rowland Hall. Teaching about my art has taken me around the country and into Canada.

As a normally shy person, I don’t like the spotlight but when it comes to sharing my culture it’s something that is easy for me to do. I have danced, done cultural presentations and worked at This is the Place State Park sharing about Navajo culture which helped me develop good presentation and public speaking skills. Being part of the cultural ENVOY leadership program at UVU I was given more opportunities to share my culture and connect with Urban natives.

I strive to teach learners about being who they are and connect with them. I connect a lot with Urban Native students. My husband is Polynesian and Native American, and when I first met him he didn’t know
N8tive Hoops
Hoop dance, storytelling, games, songs

The Goedel family, Terry, Erin, Michael, Tara, Heather, Joan, and Chante are world champion hoop dancers. The family is Yakama, Tulalip, and Lumbee. The group, known internationally as N8tiveHoops, has danced at the Olympics, for presidents, and in over 13 countries. No matter the size of the audience, the team loves to share their culture and heritage. The family incorporates storytelling and songs into their hoop dance performances, which they pride on being uplifting and inspiring for all who participate.

A love for teaching is also a family tradition: Terry has a Masters in Education, and Erin, Tara, and Joan hold Bachelor’s degrees in Education. Michael is currently studying electrical engineering at BYU, and Heather recently released an album called Shine.

For the Goedels, hoop dancing is a “family affair.” Terry has competed in hoop dancing competitions his entire life, and the family decided to join in. It is a way to share who they are, spend time with family, exercise, and connect with their roots.

“I struggled with identifying my native roots,” said Terry Goedel, “[in] 1971 I saw the Lamanite generation perform, and I was inspired by three Hoop Dancers. The next year I learned the Hoop Dance and I’ve been sharing that light with people around the world ever since.”

By showing the pride that they have in their heritage, they hope to inspire their audiences to find the same pride in their own roots and ancestors. N8tive Hoops introduces audiences to Native American songs and dances and allows them to participate and learn and ask questions about the stories and regalia associated with the dances. Their presentations can run anywhere from one day to two weeks, depending on the request.

Nino Reyos
American Indian dance and music

Nino Reyos is a member of the Northern Ute and Laguna Pueblo Indian Nations. He was born the youngest of 11 children, among the Ute People in North Eastern Utah near Ft. Duchesne, where he had spent the majority of his adolescent life. Nino holds a Master’s degree in Social Work, the only member of his family to receive a degree of higher education. He is also a Native American Veteran, and received an Honorable discharge from the United States Marine Corp.

Nino is a Northern Traditional Dancer, carrying on the Tradition of the warrior, wearing the eagle bustles of past days. Nino is also a cultural presenter, educating and entertaining audiences of all ages. He has overcome his battle of alcohol and drug use and been on his road of sobriety since 1985 and has taught Native Culture and Philosophies with seminars on cultural aspects of living, substance abuse/prevention, musical healing. He has used his cultural background as a foundation for his teaching of indigenous craft, dance, stories, and music conducting workshops in the areas of flute playing, and influencing people of both indigenous and non-indigenous cultures.

Nino has performed throughout the United States, including the well-known Indian Summer gathering in Milwaukee, WI, as well as with musicians such as Douglas Spotted Eagle and Bill Miller. Nino was one of five flute players selected to be part of the 2002 Winter Olympic Games Opening Ceremonies held in Salt Lake City, Utah. He also played at the 2007 Deaflympics Opening Ceremonies. He has released several CDs, and is a Voting Member of the Grammy Awards.

His group Twoshields Production Co. has often been requested for larger events for Native American dance and song. They offer a full production of singers and dancers from different dance categories to smaller more intimate presentations depending on request and budget. The pow-wow dance group consists of: men and women Traditional, Fancy dance, Grass dance, and the always popular hoop Dance, Navajo bow and arrow along with the basket dance.
I am Navajo/Dine’ and grew up in the city without much connection to my people, but I have always had a passion and gift for dance. I was taught traditional Navajo dance through the Title VI program at my school and then family and friends shared their knowledge with me. Dancing connects me to my culture. It has pushed me to learn more about the language, how to do beadwork, and the art involved in regalia making. As I’ve learned about my Dine’ culture, I can see there is a reason behind everything: why we dance, why we tell stories, why we bead. There is a story, lesson and meaning embedded in the art.

My art has allowed me to reconnect with my culture and share with others. It has taught me that I am not alone, that Native peoples and traditions still exist. I have been fortunate to travel the world sharing my dance. I have competed in the world hoop dance contest and have been consecutively ranked in the top ten in the world. I enjoy working with Native students, teaching them how to hoop dance as well as how to make regalia. I also have a Youtube channel, it’s a blend of Native American humor mixed with tradition. It is aimed at the youth. I have more than 140k followers on social media, maybe half are Native.

As I present, I share cultural teachings, life lessons and address stereotypes and misconceptions of Native cultures. I share my experiences of being the only Native American in the classroom. I also give background on aspects of Indigenous ways such as why males wear braids. I am available to do 30 minutes to 1 hour presentations for all age groups and demographics. Presentations can include dance, storytelling, motivational speaking and sharing my passion for social media. My art residency on regalia building is for Native audiences and can last up to two weeks depending on the project.
Peggy Black
Navajo basket weaving

Born for the Many Goats Clan and to her maternal Arrow People Clan, Peggy Rock Black learned to weave from her mother, grandmother, and sister at the age of 10-years-old. In addition to the weaving technique, Peggy knows the natural plant dyes and occasionally uses them when coloring the sumac strips she uses in her baskets. She weaves contemporary baskets but leans toward traditional Navajo designs of balance. Peggy has won many awards at shows at The Museum of Northern Arizona in Flagstaff, and at the Gallup Ceremonials in New Mexico, but she does not think of herself as a competitive person. "I only want to try different designs," she explains. And then, in a sentence that sums up Peggy's personality as well as the reason her baskets are so dynamic, she adds, "I want to experience the designs."

Today, she is passing the difficult but rewarding lessons of the art along to her three daughters.

Learners will learn the step-by-step process of basket weaving.

Poamo is Samoan, Native Hawaiian, and Apache. He grew up doing Polynesian dance with his uncle’s dance group in Hawaii and is well known in the competitive dance world. Growing up he knew he was Native, but had not done much with that culture until he met his wife, Mickaela, who introduced him to Native Dance. He then began dancing for the Cultural Envoy Leadership Program at Utah Valley University. Through Hoop Dance he feels like he is honoring his grandpa. Now he is sharing both sides of his culture.

Doing college gigs he shares about a young boy going out into the world. His goal is to influence others to have the chance to learn and better themselves. He believes that when we share our stories on how we progress and become better, we can inspire others to do the same.

In his presentations he would be willing to teach the necessities of why we dance and how we feel about dancing. He wants to show that despite culture dying, it is not lost. His desire is to help Indigenous youth to feel comfortable embracing their own culture(s).

With kids and youth he performs and talks about dance and brings a student out of the crowd. With the rest of the group they talk about what they saw in the hoops.

With groups of teachers he shares a different side of the story. He talks more on the history and the importance of hoop dance and what the dances mean to his people.
Rhonda “Honey” DuVall
Jingle dress and dance

Rhonda “Honey” Duvall is an inspirational advocate, R&B singer, powwow dancer and native american storyteller. She is Diné, from Blue Gap, Arizona and is proud to hold her clan and traditions close to her heart. She is Tangle clan, born for African American descendants, her grandfather is Coyote Pass clan.

She has performed for 12-15 years as a dancer and singer. When Honey performs the fancy shawl dance, she embodies the butterfly as it offers peace, love, and positivity in community, relationship, and our lives. The Jingle dress dance offers healing in the community and tells a story, offering words of restoration of the ancestors from the Ojibwe Tribe, in Minnesota. Honey honors the land on which she resides here is SLC, as the ancestral home of our Ute relatives, and acknowledges the five main tribal groups of Utah: Navajo, Shoshone, Ute, Paiute, and Goshute.

Honey believes that education is vital and she educates Native American culture in the way she was taught. As an advocate/R&B artist, she teaches that Indigenous cultures are still here among the cities and the lands we walk upon. She educates her audience that Native peoples are still alive and still educating through each instance and experience. This kind of artistic learning allows us to understand each other, the land we walk upon, and the hopes of generations to come. Through teaching others we understand each other. Artist Residency allows us to strive to be one with our communities and ourselves. Teaching starts within ourselves, allowing us to search inward, and then reach out to others. Art brings people together, education brings us closer.

Honey is available to engage participants in the round dance, do collaborative projects with participants, perform for audiences, and teach singing and storytelling to all age groups. She draws on audience participation as she explains the importance of her art.

My name is Rios Pacheco. I am the descendant of Tickamedakey (Tick-a-ma-dih-key) who is the only daughter in my mother’s heritage that survived the Bear River massacre. I represent my mother’s family. Growing up I went to different celebrations and ceremonies and because of this we were invited to others and brought back the knowledge to share. Most ceremonies are about caring for family and those around you, helping them to watch over and strengthen their families. I have made it my life’s work to share with all people the stories of the Northwestern Shoshone way of life.

My presentation on the Northwestern Shoshone people includes sharing information on the communal hunts of animals, gathering roots, seeds, berries and pine nut harvests. How the Shoshone people traveled to hunt, gather, and what types of living structures they used in different seasons. I include the early history of the Northwestern Shoshone before contact with outside influences through present day. For presentations small groups are best. Large groups are hard because not everyone holds their thoughts.

My name is Samuel Jake. I am part of the Navajo Nation (Diné) and grew up in Sandy, Utah. My father taught me lots about the Native way. I grew up being very involved in sports, art, and music. My parents were very supportive of my interests and expressing myself. They are still very integral in my development as an individual and artist. I have connected with others in my culture and am learning the dances and other traditional arts. This happened a lot through my photography as I worked with others.

My photography and filmmaking cover a wide range of avenues. I love working with cameras because I am able to tell stories and connect with people and places. For me, storytelling is important because traditionally that is how my culture has passed down our heritage. Culture and art are interconnected, and I want to tell people’s stories that tell their truth. Photography has no limit—you can capture anything and appreciate anything. Photography is a beautiful opportunity to understand the world better. Memories are the only thing that connects us to the past. Having a photo or video of the past connects us to those memories. I have found that my art has no limitations.

In a teaching residency, I present cultural presentations for younger students that aren’t ready to grasp the use of cameras and the photography concepts. Starting in upper elementary and middle school through adults, I bring in my camera and lighting equipment and have a hands-on photography session. I also bring a printer and do light painting in a dark room with students. I am willing to work and adapt presentations according to requests. My focus would be on helping others to tell their own stories. There are so many options. Reach out and we can figure out what will work best for you.

Shoshana is Navajo, from Mapleton, Utah. She graduated from BYU with a degree in Elementary Education. She has always been interested in her Navajo culture and loved to sing Navajo songs that she learned from aunts, parents, and grandparents. She has always loved to perform Navajo songs and dances.

In junior high school, Shoshana was introduced to the Title VI Indian Education program where she had the opportunity to learn about native culture and learned more Native songs, dancing, and Native American crafts. She has performed and done cultural presentations at big events, including the 2002 Olympic Games, and at different schools for students of all ages, Native American Leadership Conferences, and tribal ceremonies. Shoshana works for Nebo Title VI Indian Education where she helps Native American students learn about their culture, and shares Native culture with nonnative students.

Shoshana can teach about many aspects of Navajo and Native American culture including songs, dances, foods, stories, weaving, medicines, and other important aspects of Native American culture. She is also able to teach hands on activities including beading, quilting, leatherwork, moccasins, jewelry making and more. Shoshana believes that as a native teacher she has a responsibility to pass the information she has learned from her ancestors on to the next generation.

As a teacher, Shoshana is competent in multiple art forms and can present to anyone, anytime. She enjoys teaching literacy through Native American storytelling practice; as well as entire creative processes for a variety of hands-on presentations: how to dye wool, how to make fry bread, weave baskets, social Native American dance, etc. She can create an end-of-unit film for the unit or a slideshow for teachers to send to parents. She likes to create cultural opportunities for schools after completing hands-on presentations so that whole school can learn together. Her mother is her artistic assistant, Shoshana is the voice, her mother is the hands.

Terry L. Goedel is a member of the Yakama and Tulalip tribes. He has a bachelor's degree from Brigham Young University and a Master's in Education Administration from Chapman University. An educator of 30 years, Terry has taught high school and junior high math, and coached basketball, volleyball, and track.

In 1972 he first watched three hoop dancers perform near Seattle, WA where he went to school. As a young man he struggled to identify with his native roots until that day. It was as if a light was lit inside of him and he found a love for his Native Heritage. A year later at the age of 16 years old he began attending Brigham Young University where he started hoop dancing with The Lamanite Generation. He has now been dancing around the world for 50 years sharing his culture and helping audiences of all ages to find the light within. He has performed for 3 presidents of the United States, Queen Margrethe of Denmark, twice in the Rose Parade, and the opening ceremonies of the 2002 Salt Lake Winter Olympics. His recent trip to China provided him the opportunity to dance on the Great Wall of China.

In his performances and workshops he shares the meaning and story behind the hoop dance. A story of a small eagle that grows and develops that parallels our own journey through life and educational process. The use of audience participation helps students to understand and experience the hoop dance while helping each participant understand their own unique potential. Terry is open to any creative opportunities you might have for him to share his culture, his dance, and his heritage.

Ronald “Tonka” Chee, is a Navajo/Hopi Traditional dancer, storyteller, flutist, and healer from the Bears Ears region of Southern Utah. He is born for the Bitterwater clan and born to the Cliff Dwelling people. As a child, raised by his grandmother, he was born outside under a tree and taught storytelling, survival skills, and eventually art. As a 10 year old he began drawing and at 15 he began dancing as a way to share healing.

He has worked as a tattoo artist, helping to heal bad tattoos with new art, and he has taught survival skills in Boulder, Utah through Boulder Outdoor Survival Skills. He teaches Traditional dancing to a variety of age groups, and shares how dancing is a healing process rather than a competition. He shares stories, like the tale of Kokopelli, that teach how to heal from sorrow and challenge.

Tonka is available to engage participants in the round dance, do collaborative projects with participants, perform for audiences, and teach flute, singing, storytelling, and the Navajo language to all age groups. He draws on audience participation as he explains the importance of his art.

Tonka wants to help audiences understand the proper way to talk about Native Americans, that they are still here, engaging with the audience.

Ty Allison
Flute making & performance, silversmith

Everything I know about working with my hands and being creative I learned from my family. I carry the perspective that Native Peoples are not some museum exhibit: we are real people just like everybody else. I am a member of the Navajo tribe and have been playing the Native American flute for almost ten years. I work full-time as a flute maker and have been creating hand-crafted, unique, culturally-important flutes for over three years. I’ve always loved creating and working with my hands. The flutes I create are living heirlooms of cultural memory and world-renown for their unique construction and tonal quality. Symbolically, each flute is an extension of who I am and the lessons I’ve learned in life: some flute-makers throw out the wood if it has a flaw or a knot. I make the flawed wood whole, usable, and more beautiful by filling the knot with turquoise or silver and smoothing the joint.

I am also a skilled silversmith and enjoy designing and creating jewelry. Family has shaped what I make and who I am as an artist: my paternal grandmother was a silversmith and the stories my dad shared with me about her inspired my learning about jewelry-making.

I look forward to teaching people of all ages and backgrounds about the history, meaning, and practice of playing the Native American flute. Teachers can learn the history of the Native American flute and its cultural significance: I can teach them a song and round dance that they could share with their students and explain why these practices are still important. I engage the audience members with stories of the traditional flute; I teach kids how to play the flute and tell them the story of how the flute came to Native Americans. I can tell stories about and perform on the three traditional Native American instruments: drum, flute, and rattle. I enjoy telling stories about the origins of traditional songs and performing them; showing videos of how I make flutes. I teach on-site demonstrations of how to make a small wood carving; I can sing and play in collaboration with family members who are Native jingle, fancy, and round dancers and we often perform together. I can teach the round dance to large and small groups.
